ABOUT THE TRAINING:

“There is someone at work who encourages my development.”

Can you say “yes” to that statement? What about the people who work for you? More than ever, today’s employees want to work for a manager who will support their growth and development. Great managers demonstrate their commitment to their employees by investing in and encouraging their development.

This learning session will provide you with an individualized approach and tools to assist you in engaging your people in a meaningful development experience. Whether the employee is seeking a promotion or intends to stay in their current role, you can be that “someone” who encourages their development.

ABOUT THE PRESENTER:

Dan Kingkade has coached and developed individuals and leaders on their personal and professional growth and development for nearly 30 years. He brings a big picture view of both interpersonal effectiveness and business savvy drawn from his experience working with a broad range of organizations and industries. Dan has worked in the retail, healthcare and professional services fields and spent 12 years as a learning consultant and coach for the Gallup Organization. He also worked for eight years as an employee assistance program (EAP) counselor and consultant, giving him an added depth to his work with people.
